

Islam in Practice: Religious Beliefs in a Persian Village

This is a well-argued and long overdue articulation of a situation already perceived intuitively by many observers of traditional communities professing a salvation religion--especially Islam--but generally obscured in the literature by the observers' preconceptions. Here, by contrast, Iranian peasants and settled tribesmen talk directly to us for the first time: their attitudes and Loeffler's conclusions are a salutary and necessary counter to all the recent studies of Iran's urban-based Islamic Revolution and of Islam as an artifact of the establishment clergy, or of Marxist revisionists, or of western and westernized scholars. -- John R. Perry, University of Chicago
