There's a common cry among the sisterhood of midlife Christian women to the point they feel they may be having a midlife crisis. This cry is mingled with the moods and challenges of perimenopause, menopause, life phase changes, and the empty nest. The cry occurs when women find themselves increasingly frustrated by not being able to narrow down one new meaningful life calling for their next life phase. That leads them to ask, "What's Next?" Amidst the midlife dilemmas these women are navigating, they know they aren't ready to sit on a porch rocker and watch the sunset. They want a new and meaningful life calling. They want to know how to spend the next 40 years. But they feel stuck. The author helps women answer the question "What's Next?" in midlife by taking them through several exercises designed to help them identify their top five essential passions. The exercises aren't just run-of-the-mill assessments. They aren't about finding your strengths or even about your spiritual gifts. The passions you'll identify are more than things you're good at. They are part of how God has wired you. They are things you feel are essential to your well-being. They may include interests that have been dormant for some time or that were put on the back burner. It's time to identify them and stir them. Because they are God-instilled passions, they demand attention. God calls all believers to minister to the world.

When you begin to develop your passions and release them to God, he will use them in ways you might never have imagined. Don't waste another minute floundering. Change your paradigm. Try these assessments and see where they lead you.
