Diaries. v1.0

The Outsourcing Diaries is possibly the first outsourced book about outsourcing, featuring real people writing about real personal stuff. It is an experiment, a collective work of art, and also a product of our modern global society, to open up new roads to see what else is possible within the realm of our worlds today. Four human beings across the globe, male and female, from different cultures but sharing the same goal: how to earn a decent living as a freelance outsourcer. Four persons who compete online for the same type of jobs that are outsourced on a world-wide scale. To create the book The Outsourcing Diaries we joined the race to the bottom. The Race to the Bottom is a concept to explain how states compete with one another by lowering taxes and social welfare in the hope they receive more foreign investments. In this context the Race to the Bottom means that people would end up earning less and having less security, especially in the West, if we would all compete with one another, because basic costs of living around the world is unequal and because the global labor force is way higher than the market currently needs. and asked our writers: please give us secondary-entries of how your life looks like in relation to outsourcing. Some of them we only paid 1 dollar a story. At first we had no intentions nor practical ideas on what to do with the writings, other than understanding better these people. But the result is a piece of art that we got to really like and which increased very much our understanding of our fellow humans. For one reason, by reading the diaries we got much more aware that the world these days is really getting smaller, with every single mouse-click in fact. But at the same time, to speak with Thomas Friedman's "The World Is Flat" is a book by Thomas Friedman, which argues that the world is getting "smaller" and more equal-opportunity based as a result of an increase of economic trade. As services and goods become increasingly trade-able, more jobs are likely to become outsourced, digitized, or automated., the world is getting flatter, less uneven maybe but, as Friedman frankly also acknowledges, more plain as well. As we found out by reading the Diaries, the stories of our four outsourced writers offer a very personal and delicate sneak preview into the lives of people in countries considered rich and poor, people who often work hard for little money, in countries where a bus-driver earns just 150 dollar per month and jobs are hard to find. These are countries where highly skilled people need hard-working jobs to get by, to come closer to their dream of doing what they really want to do; to be free to develop their own personal cultures, without the pressure of needing to sit in an office and having to accept jobs just because society (social and economic pressure) tells them to do so. In other words, these Diaries are stories about people for whom an opportunity is a low paid job that you only want because of the money you need. They are stories about people for whom life is only a click away, when someone else literally clicked the button that says

Accept this offer. But the Diaries are more than this, as they also include stories about sharing love with children, stories of friends, partners and family, on how to deal with personal challenges and how to escape life. Stories about the goal of life, about dreams and how to accomplish them. Stories about love, religion, betrayal and commitment, about friends working abroad pursuing new careers and also about working as slaves or working on-line and getting fat.
