Not illustrated. 1835 Excerpt: ...cadence gives it the sound of a funeral wail, or a cry for help. To have its full effect upon the mind, it should be heard by night, in some wild mountainpass, and from a distance. Then the harsh tones come softened to the ear, and in unison with the hour and the scene, produce a pleasing melancholy. The contrabandista accompanied us to Granada. The sun had already set when we entered the Vega,--those luxuriant meadows which stretch away to the south and west of the city, league after league of rich, unbroken verdure. It was Saturday night: and as the gathering twilight fell around us, and one by one the lamps of the city twinkled in the distance, suddenly kindling here and there, as the stars start to their places in the evening sky,--a loud peal of bells rang forth its glad welcome to the day of rest, over the meadows L 2 to the distant hills, swinging slow, with solemn roar. Is this reality and not a dream? Am I, indeed, in Granada 1 Am I indeed within the walls of that earthly paradise of the Moorish kings 1 How my spirit is stirred within me! How my heart is lifted up! How my thoughts are rapt away in the visions of other days! Ave Maria purissima! It is midnight. The bell has tolled the hour from the watch-tower of the Alhambra; and the silent street echoes only to the watchmans cry, Ave Maria purissima! I am alone in my chamber--sleepless--spell-bound by the genius of the place--entranced by the beauty of the star-lit night. As I gaze from my window, a sudden radiance brightens in the east. It is the moon, rising behind the Alhambra. I can faintly discern the dusky and indistinct outline of a massive tower, standing amid the uncertain twilight, like a gigantic shadow. It changes with the rising moon, as a palace in the clouds, and other t...
