 Meanwhile, the Koraysh chieftains continued in varying degrees in their relentless hostility toward the Muslims. If a convert happened to be among the hierarchy of a tribe, Abu Jahl would reprimand him then ridicule the convert before his fellow tribesmen to the extent that he lost their respect.
 The uncle of Othman son of Affan persecuted his nephew severely. He took to binding him in a mat of palm leaves and lighting a fire under him. When Umm Musab heard of her sons conversion, she subjected him to starvation and threw him out of her house after which he was tortured extensively so much so that he became disfigured. Traders also suffered. When Abu Jahl discovered a trader had converted he gave orders that no one should deal with him. As a result, the convert trader was unable to sell his wares and his circumstances were soon reduced to that of an impoverished person. The freemen who suffered most were poor converts who, in the eyes of Abu Jahl, were the least important on the social scale. When one of them converted he would beat them without mercy and urge others to follow his example. As for convert slaves belonging to the unbelieving Koraysh, they received the worst and harshest punishment for their standing was by far the weakest. Punishment such as brutal beatings followed by deprivation of food and water were common, but perhaps the most severe punishment was that of being pinned down upon the scorching hot sands of Mecca and leaving the slave to endure the blistering heat of the sun without the relief of even a sip of water. Some of the physically weaker converts were unable to endure their prolonged punishment and forced to recant. However, their reversion was not from their heart, but just noises made by their tongues. Those who remained undetected would offer their prayers in secret, but there were many who did not have the privilege of privacy and their grief at not being able to offer their prayers was considerable. Bilal, the Son of Ribah Amongst those that suffered the torture of the burning sands was Bilal, Hamamma and Ribah's son, who had never known what it was like to be a freeman as he had been born into slavery. Bilal was a slave of African descent and owned by the children of Jumah. When news of Bilal's conversion caught the attention of the children of Jumah, Umayyah, Khalaf's son they subjected him to the most severe kinds of punishment. The harshest torture Umayyah devised was to take him out into the desert during the hottest part of the day, throw him down upon his back so that it lay flat upon the already scorching sand, then place heavy rocks on top of Bilal's chest to prevent him from moving. With a voice full of hatred he would yell at him, You will stay here until you either die or renounce Muhammad and worship Al-Lat and Al-Uzza!
